A Doctor's Community Contribution

Submitted by Village of Richfield Springs Historian
Harriett Geywits

The Indians of the Six Nations had known and used the local springs as a source of healing waters for many years, but the growing population in the early 1800s choose to by-pass the 'stinky waters' until a certain doctor by the name of Horace Manley promoted its benefits.

Manley was born on his father's farm in the Town of Norway, Herkimer County in 1791. Growing up, he attended local schools until the age of nineteen when he started the study of medicine in the office of Dr. Ayers of East Canada Creek, Town of Manheim. He continued there for several years and then attended Fairfield Medical College in the winter of 1814-15. The Medical College was a section of Fairfield Academy.

The Academy, located approximately ten miles north of Little Falls, was organized for men in 1802 when the community of Fairfield, Herkimer County, was an active manufacturing center. In 1804, young women were also allowed to attend classes. In 1813, a theological school was established. By 1839, the academy was reorganized as the co-educational Fairfield Seminary with a teacher training and college preparation curriculum. There was an enrollment of 551 people by 1861.

The Medical Association of Fairfield began in 1812 when forty-three students were studying medical subjects and the Academy applied for a charter as a medical college. This was done in order for them to be able to grant M.D. degrees to its students. The charter was granted under the name of "The College of Physicians and Surgeons of the Western District of New York", commonly known as Fairfield Medical College. This was the second medical college to be chartered in the State of New York; the first medical school west of the Hudson River and only the eleventh in the United States.

The college gained an excellent reputation with over two hundred students enrolled for medical training by 1833. When the college was chartered, it was mandated that in order to receive a degree of Doctor of Medicine, a student had to provide proof that he had studied physics and surgery with a reputable doctor for three years and to have attended two full courses of the public lectures of the medical professors at Fairfield or some other college. At least one term must have been spent at Fairfield. It was necessary to be tested by the medical faculty and to write and defend a dissertation on some medical subject.

Manley graduated from Fairfield Medical in the spring of 1815 and was drafted to serve in the army at Sacketts Harbor. His father was able to supply a substitute but this did not please Dr. Manley and he managed to get to Sacketts Harbor where he volunteered as a private, being soon promoted to surgeon's mate in the 40th Regiment New York State Militia. It was only two months until the close of the war, but he served proudly.

In 1816, the Doctor located in the area of Monticello (then called East Richfield), Town of Richfield, for the practice of medicine and surgery, having a large and lucrative business. In 1820, he and Daniel Richards bought a little over an acre of land for $150 in the area that became known as the Manley Spring in what was to become the Village of Richfield Springs.

Manley took his half of that acreage and built his family home here with thoughts of making use of the sulphur spring on the property.

According to Bailey's History of Richfield Springs and Vicinity published in 1874: "Directly over the spring stood a large pine tree, from beneath which the water issued profusely, covering the ground for some distance around with a thick white coating of tufaceous deposit. The tree and earth were removed to the depth of five feet where the water was found to issue from the deep crevice of a large flat rock that now forms its bed. On this rock was found the body of a large tree, still sound and perfect; also the antler of an elk, with its points ground off. The doctor thinks it had been used by the Indians for a war club. He also found ripe red plums and fresh looking green leaves that soon turned black and fell to pieces on exposure to the air. When asked how long he thought these plums and leaves had been there, he responded that it was thousands of years, no doubt, as five feet of earth and decomposed vegetation had accumulated over them without human help."

Along with his original home, Dr. Manley also built a bath house and brought approximately two dozen patients to try the water treatment. This resulted in the increased use of the spring and the popularity of the spot for summer visitors. This demanded an increase in new and larger hotels ranging in capacity from one hundred to five hundred guests, resulting in the prosperous summer community that was present during the Age of Elegance in the 1880s and the Golden Age in the 1890s, extending into the twentieth century.

Dr. Horace Manley, one of the most important citizens involved in the future of Richfield Springs, died in 1877 and is buried with members of his family at Lake View Cemetery. He, along with others in his field, brought hope, healing and advancement in the medical field as well as making many other contributions to their communities.

In 1919, the remains of Fairfield Seminary were demolished, its final course of medical lectures having been given in 1840. The stone from what was known as the South Building and the Laboratory was ground into small pieces for road building. Some of the better stones were used in the erection of a new village school house. A small portion of the Chapel was saved and converted into a Grange Hall.

The higher education of thousands of well-known men and women who contributed to the advancement of our nation, began at Fairfield as did that of Dr. Horace Manley, who at the age of twenty-nine, was responsible for what was to become a major health and resort trade for Richfield Springs.
